FOR THE HALIFAX MINERVA. The progress of Mental and Moral Improvement.

"Else wherefore breathe we in a Christian land

Shakespeare. Among the many inducements beld out to the philanthropist to persevere in his exertions for bettering the condition of his fellow man, is the visible progress of our species in mental and, especially, moral improvement. In a thousand ways this is observable. But this interesting subject conjures to "the mind's eve" such beautiful and sublime, vet varied imagery, that an abler hand than mine must attempt the picture .- I will, however, remark that both in the actions of men'(1, of course, speak generally) and the means used in the present day to instruct and moralize the species, particularly the vising generation, there is abundant evidence of the improvement above alluded to. The remark I have made is not, I suppose new: but, with me, is the more immediate product of some little reflection on reading a former number of the " Raleigh Register." The editors of that respectable print, (men of felicithe interesting fact that the late Governor of the state would not permit cards to be played in the palace; thus stopping on the threshold of official residence, an evil which that " monster, custom," had induced his predecessors to tolerate and, perhaps, encourage under the shadeings of its fair saloons and stately chambers All will acknowledge (that is all reflecting good men.) that the custom is " more honoured in the breach, than the observance." And all must admire the fearless oxercise of discretion, which dares to break its long riveted chains.
